Abstract

Typological and historical research shows that languages in close contact with one another often develop similar grammatical structures, while maintaining sharp distinctions in their lexical forms. Social contact between groups seems to promote grammatical convergence, sometimes accompanied by lexical divergence. However, the lexical/grammatical dividing line in language is not always easy to draw, and the nuanced effects of social contact on linguistic divergence therefore require further exploration. In this talk I begin with some examples from the Daly region of northern Australia, suggesting that the divergence/convergence dynamic may be better formulated as a matter of form vs order, or form vs semantics, rather than lexicon vs grammar. I then present a global survey of dialect differentiation that offers some support for this proposal.
